This is the seashore. Neither land nor sea. It's a place that does not exist.

~Alessandro Baricco

I did not love you out of boredom or loneliness or caprice. I loved you because the desire for you was stronger than any happiness.

~Alessandro Baricco

... he was one of those men who like to be observers at their own lives ... such people observe their destiny much as most people tend to observe a rainy day.

~Alessandro Baricco

It's a strange grief to die of nostalgia for something you never lived.

~Alessandro Baricco

Perhaps sometimes life shows you a side of itself which leaves you with nothing more to say

~Alessandro Baricco

You were dead.' She said. 'And in the whole world there was nothing beautiful left.

~Alessandro Baricco

We are full of words whose true meaning we haven't been taught, and one of those words is suffering. Another is the word death. We don't know what they mean, but we use them, and this is a mystery.

~Alessandro Baricco

As you see, it is not that I don't know my own mind, I know it very well but only up to a certain point in the matter. I know perfectly well what the question is. It's the answer I want.

~Alessandro Baricco

To die of yearning for something you will never experience

~Alessandro Baricco

Definitive resolutions are made always and only in a state of mind that is not destined to last.

~Alessandro Baricco

She had not really a sensitive soul, but to put it in exact terms, was possessed by an uncontrollable feeling of mind

~Alessandro Baricco

Read the flight of your arrow if you want to know your future.

~Alessandro Baricco

As eight years before, he was leaving ... to rewrite his destiny in orderly fashion.

~Alessandro Baricco

Reasons get forgotten.

~Alessandro Baricco

Do you have children? she asked. No. Why? The man answered that one had to have faith in the world to have children.

~Alessandro Baricco

There is nothing that can, in the dark become true

~Alessandro Baricco
