...we both saw something we liked, a willingness to have no walls, or maybe just an unwillingness to keep them standing.

~Ian Caldwell

The two hardest things to contemplate in life ... are failure and age; those are one and the same.

~Ian Caldwell

Two people who think they're in love can find out, when left alone, exactly how little they know about each other.

~Ian Caldwell

Love lost is a special kind of failure, I think. It's a reminder that some consummations, no matter how devoutly wished for, never come; that some apes will never be men, not in all the world's ages.

~Ian Caldwell

The strong take from the weak, but the smart take from the strong.

~Ian Caldwell

The only things people can ever know about you are the ones that you let them see

~Ian Caldwell

Never invest yourself in anything so deeply that its failure could cost you your happiness.

~Ian Caldwell

...a good friend stands in harm's way for you the second you ask--but a great friend does it without being asked at all.
