Leadership means realizing potential-in yourself and in the people you lead.... The leader and followers cocreate their identities and performance.

~Justin Menkes

What great executives do is not magic. Their performance is made possible by specific, identifiable skills.

~Justin Menkes

Often people freeze under severe pressure, but that says nothing about their ultimate capability- only their level of preparation.

~Justin Menkes

The principles that make someone a master in the chief executive role deal with whether or not they can thrive in an environment of ongoing duress, and teach others how to do so.

~Justin Menkes

Knowledge is the accumulation of information whereas intelligence is one's ability to process information to render good decisions.

~Justin Menkes

The central premise of great leadership is recognizes that fundamental fact, that not of us are fixed entities, and taking responsibility for making sure that we bring out our people's best selves.

~Justin Menkes

The intelligence gap is essentially a shortage of executives with superior thinking skills who are needed by every business, as compared with the number of decision-making positions available.

~Justin Menkes

Once an individual is given a taste of the gratification that comes from triumph, and the tools to bring it about, they will spend a lifetime in its ongoing pursuit.
