My own survival required me to counterbalance interesting with invisible.

~Rachel Hartman

We were all monsters and bastards, and we were all beautiful.

~Rachel Hartman

Haven't you always been more than yourself? Haven't we all? We are none of us just one thing.

~Rachel Hartman

The world is seldom so simple that it hinges on us alone.

~Rachel Hartman

Sometimes the truth has difficulty breaching the city walls of our beliefs. A lie, dressed in the correct livery, passes through more easily.

~Rachel Hartman

Your lies didn't stop me loving you; your truth hasn't stopped me either.

~Rachel Hartman

The world inside myself is vaster and richer than this paltry plane, peopled with mere galaxies and gods.

~Rachel Hartman

I cannot perch among those who think that I am broken.

~Rachel Hartman

If I could keep a single moment for all time, that would be the one. I became the very air; I was full of stars.

~Rachel Hartman

It is permissible to be the god of your own metaphors.

~Rachel Hartman

I was drawn to his aloofness, the way cats gravitate toward people who'd rather avoid them.

~Rachel Hartman

I barely noticed loneliness anymore; it was my normal condition, by necessity if not by nature.

~Rachel Hartman

For future reference: do not underestimate the seductive power of math.

~Rachel Hartman

Did I become court composer through masterful procrastination?
Hardly!

~Rachel Hartman

The truth may not be told. Here is an acceptable lie.

~Rachel Hartman

The twin gods, Necessity and Chance, walked among the stars. What needed to be, was; what might be, sometimes was.

~Rachel Hartman

Metaphor is awkward, but emotion, by its nature, leaves you no more scalable approach.

~Rachel Hartman

However strenuously the world pulls us apart, however long the absence, we are not changed for being dashed upon the rocks. I knew you then, I know you now, I shall know you again when you come home.

~Rachel Hartman

Heaven has fashioned a knife of irony to stab me with.
