To play the piano is to consort with nature. Every mollusk, galaxy, vapor or viper as well the sweet incense of love's distraction, is within the hands and grasp of the pianist.

~Russell Sherman

Through music time is tamed, although music never forgets to remind us of time's faceless mission.

~Russell Sherman

The contradictory, consuming, contested relationship between detail and whole, event an eventuality, breathes fire and wisdom in every great work of art.

~Russell Sherman

A work of art expresses itself as a balance sheet pitting the spoken against the unspoken.

~Russell Sherman

To master the piano is to master the universe.

~Russell Sherman

The work of art, though bound by its genetic markings and indelible fingerprints, is boundless in the infinite elaborations of its destiny, and therefore in the range of its interpretations.

~Russell Sherman

The context for music is varied and profound. If their fantasy is to be awakened-so that their sounds may be incisive or ravishing-then the menagerie of saints and dragons must be faithfully recalled.

~Russell Sherman

Surely common sense as well as anthropological evidence documents the universal need to pray, to hope, and to lament or carouse through song.

~Russell Sherman

The breath, prayers, and libido of the fingertip must somehow be transferred to the neutral indifference of the key.
