There's no such thing as being totally 'found'! the fun, I think, is in the searching.

~Sarah Stillman

There is space for a different kind of investigative reporting that's about immersion and obsessive attention to detail and deep listening.

~Sarah Stillman

What narrative journalism does is create a language or open up a space where someone can say, "Oh, this happened to me, too."

~Sarah Stillman

I tend to only be able to obsess about one thing at once, and become fully engaged in and only interested in that thing. But in the longer term, a lot of my stories also give birth to other stories.

~Sarah Stillman

I learned a lot, investigative methodology - wise, from litigators - watching their process.

~Sarah Stillman

Thinking through how you find that intersection between individual, compelling human narratives and structural, systemic injustices - that's the place that's most interesting to me as a reporter.

~Sarah Stillman

Workers are actually being starved on the largest military base in Baghdad, and women are being raped with impunity - and because it doesn't fit into a Hollywood context it's not going to fly.

~Sarah Stillman

I feel like I partly came to writing through being in college during the start of the Iraq war, and knowing that those issues mattered a lot to me, and wanting to go see for myself.

~Sarah Stillman

I try to come to my reporting as a real, whole person, not an automaton.

~Sarah Stillman

People are sometimes losing their homes before being convicted of a crime, or their cash or their cars.

~Sarah Stillman

I wanted to think about ways to get an American readership concerned with what is happening in Mexico, but also to reframe it as a problem Americans share.
